SPEECH TO PRINT

Learning to read using the speech skills students already have. With the Science of Reading aligned resource, students can become pros at mapping words by connecting speech sounds (phonemes) with letters or combinations of letters. Word chains are a fun way to help children with their orthographic mapping! By changing one sound at a time, they get to figure out the next letter and test their phonemic awareness. It's great practice for learners looking to sharpen up their spelling skills in an enjoyable way.

- Have your students write the letters that are in the words for the list of the top of their whiteboard. (If your students are struggling with writing letters, then you can use letter tiles instead however this is not as effective as having your students write the letters while saying the sounds.)
- I usually say the sound and have them write the letter or letters that correspond.
- Then say the first word in the word letter. Have a student repeat the word and then have them write the word while saying the letter sounds as they write the letters.
- Then say the next word. Have them determine what sound changes in the word and then have them write the sound that changes. Continue like that until all of the words have been written from the list, then go back and have them read all the words that they wrote.
- This is a very effective strategy for building sound-symbol relationships for students. It is very powerful and should be done at the beginning of any reading intervention lesson.
